There are usually "hidden resources" within every work place: people who are eager to help with environmental projects. If you want allies and helpers, put out the word and you may be surprised at how many of your co-workers from all walks of life will come forward to help. If you'd like to try a project but you don't have the time, ask for volunteers. They can research for local recycling resources, make phone calls, write e-mails, design posters, transport used computers to a local school, etc. The point is that you don't need to be the only one involved. You can build a team to help you. Just ask!
